RISK ANALYSIS:

Recent spikes in aggression and violence within educational settings, particularly in high-risk areas, have become a significant concern for education authorities and school leaders. This trend is exacerbated by the societal shifts post-COVID, alongside economic and social stresses faced by families. The result is a 'pressure cooker' environment in schools, leading to a notable increase in hostility and violence towards teaching staff and support workers. While many schools manage to contain aggression and violence, it remains a challenging and persistent issue for some.

What's required:

Schools and universities often lack the necessary expertise to implement effective safety measures. We strongly advise partnering with high-risk security consultants to:

1. Perform a comprehensive security audit and implement its recommendations.
2. Conduct a Training Needs Analysis and develop a bespoke Security Training Programme.
3. Ensure training programmes are interactive and engaging, designed to improve situational awareness and skills in diffusing or managing a situation, and providing a sense of wellbeing among staff that they are equipped to handle any situation of hostility.

For High-Risk Schools/Universities, ZeroRisk International Security Trainers can provide Face-to-face training & practical simulations for all staff, or via our SecApp - online training is available for new teachers, regular contractors, and administrative support.
